

Week 04 Presentation Reflection

Name: Peyman Jaferi

Self-Assessment Reflection

The strongest aspect of my presentation was the overall structure. I followed the Hook-Problem-Solution-Ask framework, which helped me present the information in a clear and logical sequence. I began by introducing an unexpected soil condition encountered during foundation excavation, which immediately captured attention and established the importance of the issue. This hook helped provide context for the audience before moving into the technical and contractual details. I also tried to apply Mayer's coherence principle by limiting the amount of text on each slide and focusing only on the most important information.

The most useful feedback I received was that I should slow down my speaking pace during technical explanations. Although I was able to stay within the three-minute limit, some sections describing the cost breakdown and contract justification were delivered too quickly. This feedback was valuable because construction presentations often involve technical information, and speaking too fast can make it difficult for stakeholders to fully understand key points. In future presentations, I will focus on pausing briefly between major points and emphasizing important figures and decisions.

One specific action I will take to improve my next presentation is to rehearse the complete presentation three times with a timer before recording or presenting. During each rehearsal, I will focus on maintaining a consistent pace and reducing unnecessary filler words. This is a measurable action that will help improve both confidence and clarity.

Before presenting, I would rate my nervousness as 6 out of 10. I used preparation as my primary strategy to manage anxiety. I practiced the presentation several times and reviewed my slides carefully before recording. This preparation helped reduce stress and allowed me to focus on delivering the message rather than worrying about forgetting information. As I became more comfortable with the material, my confidence improved and my nervousness gradually decreased during the presentation.

Overall, this exercise helped me understand the importance of concise communication, effective slide design, and structured storytelling. The feedback I received will help me become a more confident and effective presenter in future project meetings and professional situations.
